Natasha was lured into the sex trade industry when she was 15, and trafficked across Canada before managing to escape the clutches of her pimp when she was 27. As co-founder of Canada's first survivor led political activism coalition, Sex Trade 101, in 2007, She has spoken throughout Canada and internationally on sex trafficking and it's causes. She educates police officers, crown attorneys, community workers, teachers and students. She has supported over 1000 victims of sex trafficking and prostitution. She provided extensive consultation for the Canadian Government on legislation targeting human rights abuses of vulnerable women and children. And she served as an expert witness before Senate and parliamentary committees. Natasha has presented to the United Nations and offered her expertise in the formation of their sex trade policy, and she was a police foundation professor for 5 years at Humber College. Natasha is known as one of Canada's most knowledgeable and compelling advocates for ending prostitution and sex trafficking of women and children.
